

פ' וישלח תשפ"ה

Based on droshos by Maran HaGaon Rav Moshe Sternbuch shlita, Gaavad of Yerushalayim. To receive these weekly divrei Torah email ravsternbuchtorah@gmail.com.

PIKUACH NEFESH

"And he said, "If Eisov comes to one camp and strikes it down, the remaining camp will escape"" (32:9)

Why did Yaakov invest so much effort into saving himself instead of putting all his trust in Hashem?

Saving a Jewish life is a mitzvah, and when it comes to mitzvos, we are expected to employ every human effort possible in order to fulfil them. The mitzvah of saving a Jewish life applies no less to oneself than to anyone else, and Yaakov therefore wanted to do whatever he could to try to save himself and his family, also by using natural means.

When the Mirer Yeshiva fled to Japan during the Second World War some talmidei chochomim argued that that was too much hishtadlus, but Rav Leib Mallin ruled that since this was a matter of saving lives, it was not appropriate to rely exclusively on bitochon, and natural means had to be employed as much as possible too.

Similarly, it is well known that the Brisker Rov was very particular not to make any unnecessary hishtadlus, and he was always worried about whether a certain act did not constitute a lack of bitochon, and yet, during the Second World War he fled immediately without worrying whether this was a superfluous act of hishtadlus on his part, because when it comes to saving lives one must put in a lot of hishtadlus, just like we do not minimize our hishtadlus when performing any other mitzvah. The Brisker Rov added that, of course, even when putting in our natural efforts, it is essential never to lose sight of the fact that everything depends on divine assistance.

EMULATING ANCESTORS

And Yaakov said, "O G-d of my father Avrohom and G-d of my father Yitzchok (32:10)

The Sforno says that by mentioning the names of his forefathers, Yaakov intended both to praise Hashem (just like we mention our forefathers in the beginning of the Shmoneh Esrei) and to invoke their merit.

Regarding the second point, it may be objected that Yaakov's brother, Eisov, had the same zechus ovos as he did, so what was the point of mentioning it in the context of his prayer to be saved from him?

If someone follows the conduct of his ancestors then their merit assists him, but if he abandons their ways then their merit becomes a liability. Hence, Yaakov was praying that the merit of his forefathers should be a merit for him, but a liability for Eisov, who was not emulating their good deeds.

SORROW OF THE SHECHINOH

Rashi (on 32:23) quotes the medrash that Yaakov put Dinah into a chest and locked her in, so that Eisov should not set his eyes on her. Therefore, Yaakov was punished for withholding her from his brother, because had he married her, she might have caused him to improve his ways, and so, instead, she fell into the hands of Shechem.

Rav Dessler explains that Yaakov was not obliged to have married Dinah off to Eisov, and by hiding her in the chest he was acting perfectly legitimately. The claim against him was rather that he did not feel enough sorrow for the situation that had arisen, in which his brother had become so wicked, that he was forced to act in this manner.

In our times too, Hashem requires us - and especially the zadik hador - to feel sorrow when politicians seek to expel Hashem and his Torah from the Palace of the King by seeking to do away with Shabbos, by operating public transportation, opening shops that sell pork, interfering in our education, enlisting bnei Torah into the army, seeking to deliver part of the Kosel to the Reform movement who seek to turn it into a center of heresy and immorality etc. In this situation we are obligated by halocho to feel the sorrow of the Shechinoh.

Rav Sternbuch recalls vividly how he came early one morning to Rav Moshe Schneider's house to learn with him, as he did every day. He found his Rosh Yeshiva standing outside crying and shouting, "Oy, what has become of us?" Rav Schneider told Rav Sternbuch that a visitor from Eretz Yisroel had told him that Jews were desecrating Shabbos in Yerushalayim. He said "I did not sleep all night and cried and cried for the desecration of Hashem's Honor and the sorrow of the Shechinoh with Shabbos being desecrated in public in the Ir Hakodesh". He could not stop the tears from flowing, and told Rav Sternbuch, "If I had the strength, I would travel to Eretz Yisroel and shout "Shabbos!" in the streets of Yerushalayim.

DAY AND NIGHT

"And a man wrestled with him until the break of dawn" (32:25)

The gemoro (Pesochim 2b) compares the World to Come to daytime, and this world to the night. Based on that, this possuk is saying that the evil inclination fights a person incessantly until the break of dawn. Only in the World to Come will its power vanish.

The concept of wrestling involves a struggle between two people. Even after one of them has managed to knock the other to the ground, the "loser" still continues to fight and tries to knock down the temporary victor in turn. Similarly, after a person has vanquished the evil inclination once, it continues to fight him, and attempts to overpower the person incessantly, and will continue to do so until the onset of dawn.

The late Belzer Rebbe, Rav Aharon Rokeach, would say that the evil inclination focuses mainly on weakening our dedication to Torah. He explained that the yetzer horo is an angel, and therefore knows all about how powerful the Torah study of each individual is. That is why he initiates so many temptations to be mevatel his victims away from Torah.

"SWEET" DECREES

"And a man wrestled with him until the break of dawn" (32:25). Rashi: So is the habit of two people who make strong efforts to throw each other down, that one embraces the other and attaches himself to him with his arms. Chazal explained that this was the angel of Eisov

Our spiritual enemies sometimes use the tactic of pretending to be our friends and seeking to look after our interests. Throughout the generations, whenever Gentiles enacted decrees against us, we would stubbornly refuse to compromise our principles, but when non-Jews or erring coreligionists would lure us with baits of religious freedoms, political rights, economic benefits etc., this resulted in many Jews joining their ranks.

During a visit to the Chazon Ish the late Satmarer Rebbe, Rav Yoel, commented that he was very afraid of the decrees which the secular government was likely to enact against the religious public. The Chazon Ish responded that he was not so afraid of those, since, on the contrary, such decrees only serve to strengthen and unite the religious public. He was more afraid of the various "baits" which they might employ to lure away members of the religious public, because that way they conceal their hatred, pretend to have our interests at heart, and succeed in misleading members of our public.

Many Israeli politicians do not deny their goal of seeking to dismantle the partitions separating the chareidim from the rest of Israeli society. To that end, instead of fines and threats, they proffer various "temptations" under the cloak of "worrying about our future". For example, they attempt to recruit chareidi girls into working for the army in “security organizations” using the bait of large salaries. Our duty is to be on guard, and reinforce the forces of sanctity by explaining to our sons and daughters that their real goal is to harm us and attract us into their way of life.

TORAH SUPPORTERS

“And a man wrestled with him until the break of dawn. When he saw that he could not prevail against him, he touched the socket of his hip, and the socket of Yaakov’s hip became dislocated as he wrestled with him (32:25-26)”

The Zohar says that the “man” was the ministering angel of Eisov, the samech mem. He wanted to injure Yaakov himself, who is the Pillar of Torah, but when he saw that he was not successful, since he had no control over bnei Torah themselves, he attempted to injure “the socket of his hip”, which symbolizes the supporters of Torah, just like the socket supports the hip, and the hip supports the whole person. In this he was successful, so that even though he does not have the power to damage the Torah itself, he does have the power to weaken Torah learning by damaging its financial supporters.

The Zohar adds that when it says “And a man wrestled with him until the break of dawn”, this refers to the eternal war which the Soton wages throughout the golus (which is likened to the night) until the coming of moshiach (which is likened to the break of dawn). The Soton discourages wealthy people from supporting Torah properly, and conceals from baalei batim the great merit of supporting Torah.

Rav Chaim Volozhiner was once asked a difficult question in hilchos kilayim, to which he did not manage to find an answer. That night a tailor came to him in a dream and explained the depth of the sugyah with the rishonim and up to halocho lema’ase. Rav Chaim was amazed and asked him how someone who had been an am ha’oretz during his lifetime was now speaking like a great talmid chochom. The tailor answered that when he was alive he had a charity box into which he put half of all his earnings, and would give this money to Torah learners. When he reached the next world, it was pronounced that he would merit to become a godol baTorah like those he had supported, and partake of the Divine radiance like a major talmid chochom. He was then taught Torah until he reached this level. When Rav Chaim woke up, he commented that he had known about the great reward awaiting supporters of Torah, but had not been aware that they literally become talmidei chachomim in the World to Come.

OUR ENEMY WANTS TO LOSE

“He said, “I will not let you go unless you have blessed me” (32:27)”

Chazal (Chulin 91b) say that the angel told Yaakov that from the day that he had been created, his time had not come to sing a song of praise until now.

The Chebiner Rov, Rav Dov Berish Weidenfeld, explained in the name of the Avodas Yisroel that although the yetzer horo’s task is to lead us astray, since he is an angelic being who knows the truth, he is happy when we overcome him. Therefore, when he saw that he was unable to overcome Yaakov, neither in his pose as a talmid chochom nor in his pose as a Gentile, he was happy and asked to be released, because now, for the first time, the time had come for him to sing Hashem’s praises: in other words, there had been no more appropriate time for him to be happy and sing than now when Yaakov had overcome him.

Yaakov replied that he would not release him until he had blessed him: in other words, until he had confessed that Yaakov had managed to overcome him, and that the yetzer horo no longer had any power over him. Even if we cannot emulate this completely, it remains our task to attempt to vanquish the yetzer horo to the best of our ability, thereby causing our “enemy” ultimate joy and satisfaction.

ANTI-SEMITISM

“And he fell on his neck and kissed him, and they wept” (33:4). Rashi: R. Shimon ben Yochai said: It is a well-known principle [halocho] that Eisov hates Yaakov, but his compassion was moved at that time, and he kissed him wholeheartedly

Rav Menachem Zemba comments that R. Shimon is known as being doresh ta’ama dikro (deriving practical conclusions from rational reasons for commandments), but in this case he emphasizes that the phenomenon of anti-Semitism is an irrational principle. How else can we explain the fact that the Jews are accused of being socialists, on the one hand, and capitalists on the other hand; of being rich and successful, but simultaneously also poor and lazy and a burden on the state?

One rov told Rav Sternbuch that Rav Chaim Brisker told him that when he walks in the street in Brisk and sees a Gentile opposite him, he wonders why he does not hit him, since the Gentile hates him and is able to hit him. It must be that the only thing preventing him from hitting me, he concluded, is that Hashem has made him lazy, and so I must thank Hashem for His immense kindness towards me.

GUARDING OUR CHILDREN

“Now, let my master go ahead before his servant, and I will move at my own slow pace, according to the pace of the work that is before me and according to the pace of the children” (33:14)

Eisov told Yaakov: “Let’s not live so far removed from each other. My people won’t be so wicked, and your people weren’t be so righteous. Let’s compromise with each other”. Yaakov knew that he would not be influenced by Eisov, but he responded that his children would.

Rav Yisroel Friedman, the Chortkover Rebbe derived from this that if a person is asked to move to a place with no suitable Torah environment in order to engage in kiruv work, even if he is convinced that this will not have detrimental effect on him, he is not entitled to assume the same about his children.

TEACHERS AS PARENTS

“And Devorah, Rivka’s nurse, died, and she was buried beneath Beis El, beneath the plain; so he named it Alon Bochus” (35:8)

The name Alon Bochus implies that Yaakov’s family greatly mourned the death of Rivka’s nurse. Why were they so upset about someone who, on the face of it, merely fulfilled the function of servant in their household?

Devorah had not only been a physical nurse for Rivka, but also a spiritual one. She was the one who taught ethical behavior to Rivka during her childhood, and became a role model at a time when she was surrounded by corrupt relatives. Hence, Yaakov and his household mourned a personality who had played the role of a spiritual mother for his mother, Rivka.

This teaches us about the crucial role that every educator plays in the life of his or her students. If they are successful in inculcating Torah values into them, they become quasi-parents, complementing the work performed by their students’ biological parents.

AMOLEK

“And Timna was a concubine to Eliphaz, son of Eisov, and she bore to Eliphaz, Amolek” (36:12)

Rashi writes that this passage proclaims how much people longed to attach themselves to Avrohom’s descendants. Timna, a daughter of chieftains, wanted to convert to Judaism. She approached the ovos hakedoshim and asked them to convert her, but they refused. She then became a concubine of Eliphaz, the son of Eisov, saying: “I may not be worthy of marrying you, but if only I could be your concubine, since I would rather be a concubine in a family descended from Avrohom, than a princess of some other nation.”.

Timna’s desire to convert indicates that she must have possessed nitzozos (sparks) of kedusha. When such sparks merge with tumoh such as that of Eisov’s son Eliphaz, this results in descendants with especially powerful tumoh. This phenomenon explains why her descendant Amolek (and his spiritual descendants today) possess such power for evil.

LOOKING FORWARD FOLLOWING TRAGEDIES

“And it came to pass, when her soul departed for she died that she named him Ben Oni, but his father called him Binyomin” (35:18)

Rochel called her son Ben Oni (“The son of my pain”). Her objective was to commemorate for all eternity that her son had survived a birth during which she was to die, thereby praising Hashem for the miracle of his survival. However, even though her intention was to focus on the positive aspect of her personal tragedy, Yaakov nevertheless felt that it would not be appropriate for his son to bear a name that would serve as a reminder of Rochel’s death, and, therefore, to this day, he is known as Binyomin, meaning Ben Yamin, “the son of right”, signifying goodness, physical and moral strength, success and chesed (see Ramban and Alshich). Yaakov wanted his son’s name to serve as an impetus for keeping Torah and mitzvos joyfully with gevuro without any hint of Rochel’s death.

When tragedy occurs, ideally, we should be on the level where we realize that, in the divine plan, even seeming tragedies are no less aspects of Hashem’s chesed than any other event. Sometimes this becomes apparent very quickly, sometimes after a long time, and sometimes it will only be understood when moshiach comes. Nevertheless, Yaakov’s intervention (the only time he took an active part in the naming of one of his children) teaches us that the correct approach when tragedy strikes rachmono liztlon, is not to look back at all, but only forward with optimism and faith in Hashem’s absolute goodness and to endeavor to continue to serve Hashem with happiness. The name of Binyomin Hatzaddik reminds us that with gevuro (spiritual fortitude) we are capable of overcoming tragedy.

Similarly, a baal teshuva must first completely forget his past, and think only about the future and building up a Jewish home full of Torah and mitzvos, because thinking about past misdemeanors would make it very difficult for him to live joyfully in the present. Part of the mitzvah of teshuva consists in forgetting about the past and living exclusively in the present. Only subsequently, once he has become totally accustomed (or re-accustomed) to living a Torah lifestyle, should he contemplate gradually atoning for past transgressions.

On the national level, Rav Sternbuch recalls how, after the end of the Second World War, when the extent of the destruction of European Jewry, including many gedolim and tzaddikim, became clear, everybody said that there was no point in attempting to reconstruct the Torah world, and the only thing to be done was to sit and wait for moshiach to come and save us.

However, some distinguished individuals, gedolim and tzaddikim, got up and declared that this was no time to sit by idly and wait. On the contrary, it was a time to take action and re-establish the Jewish nation. With much divine assistance, they succeeded in reigniting chareidi Jewry, so that within a relatively short period yeshivos, kollelim and chadorim were set up in every Jewish center signaling an extraordinary and unanticipated rejuvenation of Torah learning and Torah institutions in Eretz Yisroel and around the world.

RABBIS AND DOCTORS

Rav Sternbuch has for decades been considered a primary posek for medical issues, as evidenced, for example, by the responsa dealing with various medical topics in the eight-volume Teshuvos Vehanhogos.

Several years ago, Rav Sternbuch spoke to hundreds of rabbis and doctors gathered for an annual Convention of Medicine and Halocho organized by the Meuchedet Health Fund.

Rav Sternbuch noted that doctors and rabbonim have certain things in common. Both of them have to decide issues of life and death and both do not have fixed working hours, since they need to be available at all times, at any time of day and whatever they happen to be doing at the time.

Of course, a rabbi is not a doctor, and a doctor is not a rabbi, but both have to know that their job is not only to define illnesses and their cures, but also to encourage and comfort the sick person. Often, the patient will despair and lose all hope of being cured, and his psychological and emotional state will in turn have a detrimental effect on his physical situation, thus reducing the chances of recovery. Therefore, it is important to speak words of faith to the patient, and explain to him that the final decision is in the hands of Hashem, and that He will help.

Incidentally, a doctor has to be careful about notifying the patient's situation to family members. He must not frighten them and use great wisdom and care when talking to them.

Doctors and rabbis have to know that they are dealing with the holy labor of reviving Jews' lives and curing them. This is a great privilege, on the one hand, but, on the other hand, it also entails a great obligation not to decide matters speedily. The definition of a great doctor is someone who considers each case very carefully before coming to a decision.

Meetings between doctors and rabbis are very important because rabbis need to know about whether diseases pose a danger to a person's life or not. There are many new developments from time to time and, for example, certain diseases which were considered to be very dangerous when I was young are no longer considered dangerous. It is therefore very important for doctors to notify rabbis of any new developments in the world of medicine with regard to various diseases, so that the rabbis can know whether a sick person with a certain disease is considered to be someone whose life is in danger or not.

The truth is that scientists are amazed at how it is possible for us to decide questions in our generation on the basis of the Torah which was given to us 3000 years ago. They admit that this is clear proof that the Torah is divine and that Hashem gave the Torah for each generation to decide questions, notwithstanding the major changes that have taken place between generations.

Meetings between rabbis and doctors are not only for their mutual benefit, but ultimately also benefit the patients, because decisions can be taken as to how to treat them best. Such meetings should be held frequently and doctors can then hear from rabbis about the halachik definition of danger to a person's life.

Every patient looks for the best doctor, and indeed for a Jew it is a mitzvah to do this because we are enjoined to do what we can to maintain and improve our health and to prolong life as it says "And you shall live by them". Just like with any other mitzvah, such as an esrog or matzah, we look for the most beautiful object, so too in the field of medicine we should look for the best, most "mehudar" doctor.

Hospitals also have to abide by halocho, and it is part of a doctor's obligations to make sure that hygiene is maintained so that patients do not become infected from diseases in hospitals. It is not uncommon for people to enter hospital with a relatively minor disease and end up becoming sicker due to something they have contracted in the hospital.

Rav Sternbuch concluded by blessing the participants, both rabbonim and doctors, that the King of Kings should continue to assist and heal all the sick members of His nation, and that we should merit the redemption speedily.